JUSTICE SOCIETY OF AMERICA

Justice Society of America has had no shortage of top-tier writers. Geoff Johns, Alex Ross, Jerry Ordway, Bill Willingham, Matt Sturges, James Robinson... all of them have chronicled the exploits of the DCU's legacy superteam. So who do you tap to continue a series previously written by talents of that magnitude?

Marc Guggenheim, that's who!

Guggenheim, who has demonstrated his storytelling skills on such comics as Flash, Amazing Spider-Man, Wolverine, Superman/Batman, Resurrection, and his current Image series Halcyon (co-written with his wife, Tara Butters—see CSN #1226 for more info!), took over Justice Society in October with #44—and he wasted no time shaking things up.

In short order, one long-time hero lost his intellect; another lost his mobility. What led Guggenheim to launch his run with such status-quo-altering storylines? Are these changes the first steps in a plan to bring major changes to the entire JSA?

"Well, not to spoil anything but I'm a sucker for stories where the hero overcomes great adversity," Guggenheim said. "In the case of Mr. Terrific, I thought taking away his intelligence was a great premise for adversity for a character like Mr. Terrific. It's also, I think, a very interesting mystery: Why is this happening to him? Why now?"

"As for timing, I'm throwing a lot of balls up into the air and some will land sooner than others. For the time being, I'm enjoying tormenting him."

Making His Mark on the Justice Society

"And as far as Alan Scott is concerned: when I took over the book, I sent the DC Powers That Be (affectionately known by me as the DCPTB) a laundry list of ideas and pitches, some more radical than others. There were ones that I never thought I'd get a thumbs up on. One of them was paralyzing Alan. But much to my surprise, the DCPTB signed off on it, enthusiastically. They understood where I was going and what I'm trying to do and it was a pleasant surprise how easy it was to sell them on it."

Ever since the early years of the Silver Age, the Justice Society has been characterized by two aspects: its historic role in the DCU, and its "melting-pot" nature as far as lesser-known and/or legacy heroes are concerned. Does Guggenheim intend to explore and/or discard either or both of those aspects? "No, both elements are an integral part of the series and will remain so," Guggenheim said. "My goal is to build on these two elements and add to them, not replace them. If anything, my approach will be to make the team even more of, as you say, a melting pot. We'll be adding plenty of more legacy and lesser-known heroes."

"I'm also determined to create a few new toys to play with because it occurred to me that this was a golden (pun?) opportunity to add some new things to the DC Universe, to put a few new toys on the floor to play with."

Can that historic aspect of DC's oldest superteam actually be limiting to a writer? Does Guggenheim think that it's time to put the WWII era Justice Society away? "I definitely feel like the WWII era has been played out for a while," Guggenheim said. "Geoff Johns and Bill Willingham did some great stuff along those lines, and neither are writers I'm eager to compete with. Plus, I really want to expand the JSA's rogues gallery beyond people with swastikas on their chests."

"I think my first two issues (44 & 45) demonstrate the kind of balance I'm trying to strike. In JSA #44, we introduce a new villain—Scythe—who has ties to al Qaeda and is, therefore, as far away from WWII as I think you can get—but then, in #45, we revealed that he actually has ties to a secret Nazi program. So am I trying to have my cake and eat it too? Always!

"I never want to say never and I like to avoid grand pronouncements on what I will and won't do. I want to always keep everyone guessing."

So as Guggenheim sees it, what is the role of the Justice Society. In a DCU that already has a Justice League, where do the JSA fit in? "Well, the obvious and easy answer is that they're the guys who are helping 'raise' the latest generation of heroes. They're also the mentors and counselors of the League. They're the elder statesmen (and women!) of the DCU."

"But my hope is that with this 'Supertown' approach, people will see that the JSA has found a new way to be role models for other heroes. 'Supertown' started with a city-destroying super-battle, the kind most heroes just walk away from afterwards and the clean-up is done off-panel, in between issues. But with 'Supertown,' the JSA is saying, 'No. We're staying on for the long haul. We're fixing this place and then sticking around to make sure it thrives.' It's a new way of inspiring the generations of heroes who have come after them."

Are their any characters that Guggenheim envisions as integral to the Justice Society—characters who should never be removed from the team? If so, who, and why? "Oy. This strikes me as one of those minefield questions where if I leave someone off the list, I'll get dinged, but if I include the kitchen sink roster, it gets away from the basis of the question, relating to who I consider the 'core team,'" Guggenheim explained diplomatically. "So let me sidestep the landmine and say that I consider Jay and Alan the heart and soul of the JSA. Those are the two guys who are the forefathers of the DCU. I think Wildcat has gained an emeritus position in that pantheon, if you want to make it a triumvirate, but I don't know if you could consider Ted—who I love and love writing—one of the forefathers of the DCU."

Taking it from another angle, are there any characters that Guggenheim would like to remove from the team? "Nope, I'm not gunning for anyone. If anything, I'm trying to expand the cast!"

So then, what is the ideal roster size for the Justice Society?

"I guess that depends upon what the take of the book is," Guggenheim said. "If we're talking the JSA as a regular super-hero team, I find that more than six, certainly seven, becomes cumbersome. But what we're trying to do, starting with JSA #44, is introduce a new approach to the JSA, something that transforms them from a traditional super-hero team into something far more ambitious and, hopefully, interesting—and that's a literary society of super-heroes. To that end, I've been trying to think of the characters in the book less as a team or a roster, and more as a cast, an ensemble."

Does this new approach lend itself to a consistent roster, or does Guggenheim see a this ensemble approach leading to a core membership and a rotating supporting cast? "For this take—which I've been calling 'Supertown'—it's something of a 'shifting focus.' The spotlight will move around to different characters as stories evolve and intertwine. It's very different from how the JSA—or, for that matter, any super-hero team in the DCU—has been handled in the past. It asks the readers to be accepting of a different kind of JSA book."

"I think the time is right. We're coming up on fifty issues of this volume of JSA. It's time to try some new things, shake things up a bit. All the characters you love will still be there, but hopefully in a context that's exciting to everyone and one that will allow you to see even more of your favorite characters."

During its current run, the Justice Society has been linked to DC's multiverse, especially through the Geoff Johns-Alex Ross "They Kingdom Come" storyline. Will Guggenheim further explore those multiversal aspects? "Not at present. When I inherited the book, Bill Willingham had just done a great alternate history story, and as you mentioned, Geoff Johns and Alex Ross's 'They Kingdom Come' still looms large in recent memory, so I think that ground needs to lie fallow for a little while."

Some of the JSA's best villains, characters like Vandal Savage, are now a part of the greater DCU—o how do Guggenheim go about establishing a rogues' gallery for the team? Will he dig up obscure villains from their past, or start from scratch and create new adversaries? "I made a decision—hopefully, the right one—to start from scratch and create brand new adversaries rather than give old villains a makeover. I'm all for the latter approach, but I really wanted to be... ahem... brave and bold in taking over the book and start us off with a bang, putting new toys on the floor straight from jump."

"My hope is that once we return to old villains or previously-established villains, it'll be all the more special because we'll have waited and delayed gratification on that front. I'd also really like to bring in villains from other corners of the DCU that aren't necessarily related to the JSA or have a history with them. For example, I'd love—love—for the Joker to pay a visit to Monument Point and cause some havoc..."

Just over a year ago, DC further expanded the Justice Society's corner of the DCU with the addition of a second monthly title, JSA All-Stars. Has Guggenheim engaged in any discussions with JSA All-Stars writer Matt Sturges regarding storylines? "Ah, now we get into some spoiler territory," Guggenheim responded. "The short answer—and the only one I'm permitted to give at the moment—is that fans who want to see some closer coordination between the JSA proper and the All Stars are not gonna be disappointed."

Of course, any discussion of superteam crossover stories must acknowledge the historic interrelationship between the Justice League and the Justice Society—a tradition that goes back almost fifty years now. Will that continue—and if so will Guggenheim be involved in writing the crossover? "Both excellent questions, to which I would say... I have no idea. I hope the answers to both question are resounding 'yeses,' but it hasn't been discussed. I basically grew up on the JLA/JSA crossovers of yore. I followed the JSA from the pages of Adventure Comics into the JLA during one of those crossovers and that was my introduction to the League. So, those stories have a very warm place in my heart."

And what about DC's big event stories in the works for 2011—will the JSA play any part in any of them? "The DCPTB have instructed me to be play coy regarding this—so this is me playing coy," Guggenheim said with a smile.

Guggenheim's Justice Society of America run began in October's JSA #44. The storylines continue into #s 45 & 46, already available, and into late January's Justice Society of America #47. Guggenheim is joined by artist Scott Kolins on the monthly superteam series.
